Satyajit Ray believed that it is possible to make realistic cinema even with an inexperienced team when he saw the movie 'Bicycle Thieves' in London. For his famous movie 'Pather Panchali', he collected a group of inexperienced people as technicians. Most of them stayed loyal to him and worked with him on several films even without any kind of permanent contract.

Even when his funds got over, he didn't give up and kept shooting for Pather Panchali. When it was finally released after 3 years, it won many awards and established his reputation as a major film director. His films changed the perception of Indian films globally, and also had societal impact during his times because of using strong female characters. His films used a unique storytelling style of everyday struggles of human beings which moved masses. He also introduced new techniques of photo-negative flashbacks and bounce lighting which were not used before in film making. He said, "My films are about human beings, human relationships and social problems."
